

WILTSHIRE HORN

The Wiltshire Horn is the original shedding meat sheep, with origins going at least as far back as Roman times and possibly originating from northern Africa and/or the Middle East. During the 18th century it is recorded as being the most populous sheep in parts of southern England where it grazed extensively across the rough hilly common land and was renowned for its hardiness and ability to convert poor forage into lean meat. With the resurgence of the woolled merino breeds into the UK the breed fell from favour, and has only recently benefited from a renaissance with declining wool prices. The rams make excellent terminal sires with a high degree of hybrid vigour in the progeny. The breed was first introduced into New Zealand in the 1970's but since the majority of the foundation animals were cross-bred stock the pure breed has never become strongly established here, and there are only a handful of breeders. The NZ Wiltshire or Wiltipoll has found more favour here, being a crossbred of a Wiltshire Horn with a polled wool breed. The pure Wiltshire Horn has a much stronger following in Australia with a very active breed society.
